Superfresh blueberry volume projected up 65 percent

By

Asher Campbell

June 4, 2026

Superfresh Growers is preparing for a larger Northwest blueberry crop in 2026, with the season expected to begin earlier than usual and volumes significantly above last year. The company anticipates the first shipments from its Norris Farms program around June 8, roughly seven to 10 days ahead of the historical average. Warmer conditions in winter and spring accelerated crop development throughout much of the region. Overall blueberry volume is projected to increase 26 percent compared to last season, with organic production expected to rise approximately 65 percent.

Trendspotting: National brands vs. private label in fresh departments

By

Craig Levitt

June 4, 2026

It is no breaking news that the biggest differentiator a supermarket has is its fresh departments — especially produce. However, the way customers shop these categories, specifically how it relates to national brand and private label purchases, may be changing.
